

The Role of Private Companies in Fighting Against Corruption in China

Ms. Zhang Xian

National Audit Office of China
September 2024

Contents

- I. National Conditions in China
- II. How Private Companies in China Fight against and Prevent Corruption
- III. How the Chinese Government Support for Anti-Corruption in Private Companies

I. National Conditions

- Since China's reform and opening-up, private businesses have grown rapidly. However, corruption within these companies has also increased.
- The Chinese government encourages growth of private sector and prioritizes the anti-corruption by establishing systems to prevent and combat it at its source.

II. How Private Companies Fight against and Prevent Corruption

I. Strengthening Audit Oversight

Private companies are improving their audit systems to ensure that financial transactions, management, and operations are accurate and lawful. These audits help detect corruption and ensure compliance with regulations. Auditors collaborate with other departments, such as legal and risk management, to prevent corruption at different stages of business operations.

II. How Private Companies Fight against and Prevent Corruption

II. Building Compliance Systems

Compliance helps companies self-regulate and prevent corruption. Businesses create rules against practices like off-the-books accounts and false transactions. These rules provide a foundation for audits and help businesses manage risks, promote growth, and protect stakeholders.

II. How Private Companies Fight against and Prevent Corruption

III. Incorporating Anti-Corruption into Performance Evaluations

Private companies include corruption risks in their performance evaluations and make it a critical factor in assessing employees as well as departments.

This encourages managers to closely monitor staff and hold individuals accountable for corruption actions.

II. How Private Companies Fight against and Prevent Corruption

IV. Using Technology to Detect Corruption

Companies are using data analysis to identify and investigate potential corruption risks. This includes monitoring unusual patterns in business data that might indicate corruption activities.

II. How Private Companies Fight against and Prevent Corruption

V. Fostering an Integrity-Based Culture

Private companies are working to create a culture of honesty by setting ethical standards for employees and providing anti-corruption education and trainings. This helps raise awareness and reduce corruption risks.

II. How Private Companies Fight against and Prevent Corruption

VI. Collaborating with External Partners

Private businesses are working with government agencies to fight against corruption. By sharing information and cooperating with authorities, private companies help corruption practices to be identified. They are also partnering with suppliers and social organizations to promote clean business practices across their networks.

III. How the Chinese Government Support for Anti-Corruption

I. A Business-friendly Environment

The Chinese government is working to create a business environment that is market-driven, law-based, and open to the world. It aims to protect the rights of private businesses, ensuring that all companies can compete fairly and receive equal legal protection. The government encourages private companies to improve their compliance and management systems and adopt better business practices.

III. How the Chinese Government Support for Anti-Corruption

II. An Improved Legal Framework

To help combat corruption in private companies, the Chinese government has implemented laws that punish corrupt activities such as embezzlement and bribery. The government also supports efforts to recover assets gained through corruption. Additionally, private companies are encouraged to establish strong internal audit systems and financial controls.

III. How the Chinese Government Support for Anti-Corruption

III. An Enhanced Anti-corruption Function of SAI China

The National Audit Office of China plays a significant role by providing guidelines for internal audits and helping private companies develop their anti-corruption capabilities. By learning from international best practices, China aims to strengthen the role of audit in combating corruption for the whole society.

Thank You!

中华人民共和国审计署

National Audit Office of the People's Republic of China